Mirroring Belief: Marguerite De Navarre's Devotional Poetry

Gary Ferguson

Queen Marguerite de Navarre's contributions would probably have been remembered mainly as a footnote to history if she had also not written the Heptameron, a collection of often erotic and irreverent stories that ridicule the life and institutions of the times, including the Catholic Church, especially the monks. The critic George Saintsbury commented that the stories in the Heptameron are infused with "the fear of God, the sense of death, the voluptuous longing and voluptuous regret for the good things of life and love that pass away." The Heptameron had a significant influence on the shaping of French literature and is considered a classic to this day. A view of the Navarre region as it is today. | Source. The End. She was married to Henry II of Navarre. Her brother became King of France, as Francis I, and the two siblings were responsible for the celebrated intellectual and cultural court and salons of their day in France. Marguerite de Navarre was not the only educated woman to write and publish verse during the first half of the sixteenth century, but she was the first woman of the French nobility who carefully compiled from her complete works a selection of poems, prayers, religious meditations, songs, biblical and secular (without biblical characters) plays, and other works that she felt worthy to appear. Her belief that eternal salvation could only be received, if given, from the sincerity of Marguerite loved reading and particularly enjoyed poetry. As young adults, she and her brother exchanged rhyming notes, but she is unlikely to have written verse as a child. In Female Scholars: A Tradition of Learned Women Before 1800, ed. J. R.
